The New York Times, 9 March 2010

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Counterterrorism forces have shot and killed one of Southeast Asia's most-wanted Islamic militants, Indonesia's president said Wednesday.

The police said the militant, who went by only one name, Dulmatin, was a senior operative for Jemaah Islamiyah, the Southeast Asian terrorist network with links to Al Qaeda. He was killed in a raid near an internet cafe in Jakarta on Tuesday morning, the authorities said.

The authorities had accused Mr. Dulmatin of setting and triggering one of the bombs used in an attack on a Bali nightclub in 2002 that killed 202 people.

Main Opposition to Boycott Myanmar Election

The New York Times, 29 March 2010

BANGKOK — After months of internal debate, members of the party of Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, the long-detained pro-democracy leader, defied Myanmar's junta by announcing Monday that they would boycott the country's first elections in two decades.

The move raises questions about both the future of the Burmese opposition and the credibility of the vote.

According to election laws the junta released earlier this month, the decision means that the party that has served as the mainstay of the country's democratic movement for two decades, the National League for Democracy, will be automatically dissolved. Western governments, including the United States and Britain, had said that Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi's participation and that of her party were prerequisites for legitimate elections.
